Customer Reviews

Delaney is just as frustratingly clueless about her personal safety as she's always been. Somehow you'd think that a police chief--who just got shot a few months back because she wasn't paying attention--would have figured out that maybe it would be a good idea to lock her door and listen when people tell her she's in danger and needs to be especially careful. Not Delaney. She decides to keep leaving her door unlocked and then go running on the beach with no weapon instead. Sensible girl. Really. That's one issue I have with Delaney, while another is the fact that she hasn't bothered to read up on her other job, being the god's bridge. She's left all her family journals about the gods and the Reed family's experiences with them and all the various creatures to Jean. How does Jean's studying the journals do anything to help Delaney get more competent and better educated in her position? It's like Delaney thinks that she, Jean and Myra are some triumvirate that can magically share the position, when in fact the other two can't do her job because they aren't firstborns. They won't always be around when Delaney needs to know whatever the journals hold and she's got to stop thinking she's anything less than fully responsible. I'm not sure I even like Delaney at this point because she's still so stupidly irresponsible and other people are paying the price for it. On to the rest of the book. The plot is interesting but is not resolved within the volume and that bothers me. Clearly the war between the gods, their allies and subjects that was referred to in the last book, wasn't going to be over and done in this one, but I would have thought Monk would at least resolve the mystery by figuring out who murdered Sven and then confronting the murderer/s.
