Neighbor Power: Building Community The Seattle Way
Building on the lessons of early labor leaders, civil rights volunteers, and political activists, Jim Diers has developed his own models and successful strategies for community development. Neighbor Power chronicles his involvement with Seattle’s communities. This book not only gives hope that participatory democracy is possible, but it offers practical applications and invaluable lessons for ordinary, caring citizens who want to make a difference. It also provides government officials with inspiring stories and proven programs to help them embrace citizen activists as true partners.

Diers’s experience is extensive. He began as a community organizer in 1976, then moved on to help establish and staff a system of consumer-elected medical center councils. This led him to Seattle city government, where he served under three mayors as the first director of the Department of Neighborhoods, recognized as the national leader in such efforts. In the 1990s, Jim Diers helped Seattle neighborhoods face challenges ranging from gang violence to urban growth. The Neighborhood Matching Fund grew to support over 400 community self-help projects each year while a community-driven planning process involved 30,000 people. Diers provides evidence that productive community life is thriving, not just in Seattle, Washington, but in towns and cities across the globe. Both practical and inspiring, Neighbor Power offers real-life examples of how to build active, creative neighborhoods and enjoy the rich results of community empowerment.

It was cheering to learn that, in a city obsessed with reaching impossible consensus before acting, things are actually getting done here. I also learned some delightful details about when, where, and how certain Seattle landmarks were born. If you’re an activist, you’ll find some concrete, useful theories and techniques on how to accomplish your goals. I’m no activist. But reading about these small, very important changes—made by common citizens—could make an activist out of anyone.

Neighbor Power is an excellent book! Smart. Funny. Inspiring. If you’re interested in Seattle—or if you’re interested in community building—or if you’re interested in how local government works (and sometimes fails to work)—or if you’re just interested in people and you like hearing good stories—read this book.

As a resident in a transitional neighborhood, I find the example and stories in this book inspiring. The book is informative with examples of individual contributions making a difference as well as the power when people organize.

I was slightly hesitant to buy this book because its nine years since publication. But once I started, I couldn’t put it down. Diers writes with authority from real life experience, timeless principles, and an easy to read manner. I am going to get more copies to share with other people in government, organizations, and community leaders.
