Detective Inspector Hannah Robbins of the Nottingham City division Major Crimes Unit are called to the scene of a body dump in a filthy alley. The investigation reveals the young girl suffered a horrible fate and while the team investigates amidst intense internal and external pressure to find the killer, another body in a similar state pops up. Then a third possible victim is uncovered, putting the team in a fierce race against the clock to find the girl, if she actually exists, and stop a madman. Or possibly several madmen. This fast-paced, exciting, gritty British police procedural, told from multiple points of view, opens with a disoriented, terrified, naked girl in a dog cage and doesn't let up from there. In addition to the crime investigation, the officers are facing personal challenges. Hannah has a complicated relationship with her father, and is dating the local crime reporter, unbeknownst to her team. She's not sure whether he's dating her because he likes her, or because of her job. And she's not sure she cares. One of her team, Sally, is pregnant and her husband is not supportive of her police work. Everyone is keeping secrets from everyone else. Normally the multiple-points-of-view angle is a stumbling block for me, but in this case it worked. I never got lost trying to figure out whose head I was in at the moment. The scene setting was well done – I felt like I right there, driving through the streets of Nottingham with Hannah in the race to find the killer(s), or going down the scary stairs into the torture chamber with Sally, or at Sally's desk while she worried about her husband's reaction when he figures out she hasn't been telling the truth. And the ending was a complete surprise to me, which I enjoyed.
